Choral Camp Cream Slides By Again

Despite the threatening clouds and sprinkling rain the choral camp cream turned out to be another success story. Campers of all ages and sizes dogpiled Conrad Showalter while other campers tried out new hairdos and tried wearing beards. One new observation can be made . . . despite all the shaving cream, no shaving of the legs or face was attempted. The shaving cream was instead put to use in the aforesated ways.

Balloons Soar, Braids Snag at Breakfast

How were the girls to know? Most of the time braids really appeal to Phyllis Swartz, and she will give the hall with braided hair permission to eat breakfast first. Not on Tuesday morning! Jeremy Miller's balloon hat creations for all the guys in Bach Hall won them recognition, honor, and the right to eat first.

Try again, girls. The Record thinks braids are great even when Phyllis spurns them!

Order of the Fork Chartered

Choral Camp silverware is valuable, and should not be thrown in the garbage cans along with the garbage. At least that's what Camp Hostess Alta Shrock was telling Phyllis yesterday. She was holding a fistful of dirty forks at the time, and they were discussing ways to help campers remember the silverware.

It was only after her daughter, Ashley, asked, "Why did you do that?" that Alta realized she had thrown the forks in her hand into the garbage after the conversation was over.

Later, in a spontaneous burst of responsibility, a group of counselors formed The Order of the Fork to address the problem. They look serious, campers, so be sure not to pitch your silverware!

"He was in my first recorder class, and he was a pain!"

—Debbie Diller, after complimenting the way Andy Sommers was directing the camp cream

"Some of us kinda liked Debbie. It was just our way of trying to get attention"

—Andy Sommers, after sheepishly admitting he remembered his behavior

The Troubadour

Featuring the potential adventures of a Choral Camper named Da Capo al Segno, or D.C. Al for short. His friends just call him Bob.

For the first day, camp was going about as well for Bob as anyone could expect it to for a new camper. But yesterday, the rain caused him to lose his concentration. Right after the big cream (which he loved), he was walking with some other creamed-up campers when he realized he had walked right into the girls' dorm! Two girls coming in behind him suddenly recognized that a boy was in the hall and screamed piercingly, scaring him so badly he let out a small yelp himself. It was only a little yell, and he stifled it quickly, but not before the girls heard him.

Embarrassed and dejected, Bob sought comfort in the office of the camp pastor, Conrad Showalter. Alone with such a kind man (and cheered by the scent of shaving cream coming from Conrad), Bob admitted he was homesick and really wanted to see Mom. "Well Bob," Conrad said, "I'm glad you mentioned your mother. We just got an email from someone at your house that I was hoping to talk with you about."

Taste of Cultures Class Questioned

Lynette Showalter's culture class gives campers an actual taste of various cultures. So far, campers have taken virtual trips to Tibet and Appalachia. In Tibet, campers tasted butter tea, a salty drink made from nak (female yak, like Kuru!) butter.

While in Appalachia, campers sampled cornbread baked in a black skillet and also some sorghum.

The results from these taste tests you ask? Just look at the faces of these campers. Chalk one up for the cornbread! Stay tuned for other tastebud tantalizing adventures with Lynette.
