Former Director Attempts Camp Sabotage!

By Billy Bob Woodward

Camp was off to a great start. Everything was clicking. Counselors were leading. Campers were singing. Directors were directing. But behind the scenes, ex-directors were sabotaging! At first, it was a mystery that needed solving. Chapel was about to start on the first day of camp, when suddenly the projection program stopped working. How were campers to sing without words projected on a screen? Camp Director Kirk Kaffman was quick to blame hackers. "Since we are studying the Ukraine this year in culture class, perhaps we would be a prime target for Russian hackers." When RBC president Jeremy Miller was asked about the possibility, his answer was evasive, "I can neither confirm nor deny the presence of Russian hackers in our computer system."

History teacher Jared Stutzman raised eyebrows when he refused to answer questions about the malfunctioning software. "I've felt for years that we should sing fewer songs 'off the wall.' What's wrong with using hymn books during chapel? I see this as divine intervention." In spite of the speculation, it eventually became clear that ex-Director Matt Showalter was sabotaging the camp. Without letting anyone know, he had the program open in his office, making it unusable by anyone else! Chapel worship leader, Ericka Byler was quick to speculate about why Matt would pull such a stunt. "Ever since he stepped down from directing camp, he just hasn't been the same. We thought it was just old age, but maybe there is more of a nefarious reason behind his sabotage. Maybe he doesn't like guitars," she said as she strummed a G cord while gazing off into the distance. When we were finally able to reach Matt for comment, he simply changed the subject. "The weather is beautiful today," he said before running off and disappearing into the nearest cornfield."
